Scholarly interests

I study the ways that various relationships within and among organizations are constructed to affect change and stability throughout societal sectors. My work straddles political, economic, and sociological issues to particularly focus on the construction of relationships through which status is created, competition is generated, and knowledge is disseminated in and between public sector organizations, such as universities, nursing homes, primary care centers, and upper secondary schools. I show how these relationships spawn different—and, at times, disproportionate—flows of material and immaterial resources that can engender major consequences for actors within and among affected organizations. This research is important for scholars, policy makers, and organizational members alike because it highlights the necessity and possibility to shape and reshape relationships that promote an equitable distribution of resources throughout contemporary society.

Pedagogy activities

I have taught a wide range of topics in marketing, leadership, accounting, management, and organization theory. My teaching experience includes campus and online courses in Swedish and English on the Bachelor, Master, MBA, and doctoral levels at Gävle University, Örebro University, Uppsala University, and Mälardalen University. In addition to courses, my teaching experience encompasses the supervision of 12 Bachelor theses and three Master theses to successful completion. I have currently taught for 3596 hours, out of which supervision constitutes 582 hours. My formalized teacher training comes from Uppsala University's Unit of Quality Enhancement and Mälardalen University's Pedagogical Development Center, where I have completed courses in academic teaching (13 ECTS) and doctoral supervision (4 ECTS). Starting fall 2024, I am supervising a doctoral student and mentoring a postdoctoral researcher at Mälardalen University's School of Business, Society, and Engineering.
