Research

Ongoing effort to contribute to understanding of nature and significance of political transformation in the context of 'development'.

Concrete focus has been on the transition from anti-colonial liberation movement to juridically sovereign state power as well as on subsequent post-colonial developments. What happens in these historical processes both to the social basis of state power, to political culture, to the internal structuring of the political system, to the policies resulting from the exercise of state power, and to the ways in which these four levels of societal reality are linked to each other – all of this seen also in its international context? What are the implications for 'development' and 'democracy'?

Since the nineteen-seventies, empirical illustration has been provided mainly by the cases of Guinea-Bissau and Mozambique, including close fieldwork. Earlier empirical studies were on Mexico, Tunisia and, more limited, Algeria. Continues to follow the case of Guinea-Bissau well into the present century.

In the nineteen-eighties, Scandinavian (Nordic) third world policies was added as a field of research in its own right.

In the nineteen-nineties, work was devoted also to exploring the relevance of Max Weber's thinking on development to current research concerns with modernisation and democratisation.

This led on to continued work on the concepts and realities of democracy, development, globalisation, power, and their linkages to each other. Most recently the concept of 'sustainable development' has been introduced into this effort, thus complicating the analysis even further.

Supervision of doctoral students

Political science, Uppsala University	Ten doctoral theses, 1974-1988. One thesis, 2000-2006.
Cultural geography, Uppsala University	Supplementary supervision of two theses, disputations in 1986.
Theology (mission history), Roskilde University, Denmark (development studies)	Supplementary supervision of one thesis, disputation in 1987. External supervisor of one thesis, disputation in 1997.
IHCAR, Karolinska Institutet, Stockholm (social medicine)	External supervision of one unfinished thesis, 1995-2000.

Teaching

Broad and deep teaching experience at post- and undergraduate levels, both within political science and the transdisciplinary field of development studies. Has over the years supervised a very large number of term papers at B, C, and D/Master levels. Between 1994 and 2004, for one example, thirty-one of those C-level papers were published in the Minor Field Study Series then edited by the Unit of Development Studies, Uppsala University. Has in recent years supervised several MA theses within the two-university Masters course in Sustainable Development offered by Uppsala University and the Swedish University of Agricultural Sciences.

Took active part in initiating in 1977 a B-level (second semester) course and in 1991 a C-level (third semester) course in development studies, as well as organising researcher courses in the politics of development within the Political Science Department, recruiting participants also from other disciplines.
